My little Darling,

At least I can say that there is one of us who is faithful in his letter writing (Ah-hem!). Today I was out at Wheaton and guess what I didn't find? Yep, right the first time! I didn't feel hurt, but I was a little discusted. Imagine, all week, only one little letter. Surly, you were no busier than I was last week taking exams, staying up most of every night. You should be ashamed of yourself! Now, I hope you feel sufficiently scolded. Remember, if you want letters, you must send letters. For right, I ought not send you a letter until I receive one from you. Then how many would you receive? Ha!

Seriously, I can't understand why you sometimes receive two letters at the same time. I don't ever remember sending two letters on the same day. I try to have a letter in the mail every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday morning, writing them on Tuesday, Thursday, and the week ends. Sometimes something interfers, but that is my schedual. My letters have been rather long thus far; but from now on I believe I'll not have time to be so "gabby." I like to write more than most anything else and it is hard to stop, especially when it concerns you.

Sweetheart, there is something else. You have been sending many letters to me. Can you afford this. I know you have little or no earnings and perhaps I could help you out a little. What do you think?

Concerning the payment of your dress and shoes. We can let that go a while and eventually if you say, "I will" or "I DO," I'll own the debt to myself. But do as you please.

Tomorrow will be a busy day. We'll have to get everything ready to go on the trip. I enjoy traveling and will have a good time I'm sure. Of course, you would have to be along to make the trip perfect.

Really, there is little to write about. I've been busy around the house, received no mail from you to answer, and so on. Now if you want a longer letter, you had better send a few. Well, here's hoping.

Your "only Sweetheart,"
(and husband!),

Bernie
